Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The nomination for the Properties Associated with the Oconee County Penal System includes two properties located within the city limits of Walhalla, the county seat of Oconee County, South Carolina. The properties are the Oconee County Jail, a two-story, brick building constructed between 1901 and 1906, and a jail on wheels, the only remaining one of several metal cages on wheels used as quarters for convicts serving on the county chain gang in the early twentieth century. Although alterations were made to the rear of the jail and it was stuccoed in the 1930s, and the cage is now located on the property of the modern law enforcement center rather than on a work site, both the jail and the cage retain sufficient integrity to convey their historical associations.

Additional Information: The penal system in Oconee County conformed to the county penal system which was enforced throughout South Carolina in the early twentieth century. The county jails of the state were intended for the detention of persons awaiting trial in state courts who were unable to pay bond. If a person was convicted, he was sentenced to serve at hard labor, usually on the county chain gang. Female convicts and convicts not wanted by the county authorities were sent to the state penitentiary. Most convicts served their sentences on the county chain gangs. For example, in 1916, 3266 persons were committed to county chain gangs, while the population of the penitentiary in 1916 was 211.

Like other early twentieth century South Carolina jails, the Oconee County Jail consisted of two sections, the jailer's residence and the jail department. The front portion of the jail served as the jailer's residence and the prisoners were kept in the rear wing.²

The county chain gangs were located near the roads on which they were working. Guards usually lived in tents; the convicts' quarters were generally cages, cars, or tents. Cages were used in Oconee County. The cages and cars were on wheels and were usually about seven feet wide, seven feet high, and eighteen feet long. The cars had wooden sides; the cages, which were more common, were made of iron or steel strips, about two inches wide, woven in three- to five-inch squares. In December 1916 visits to some county chain gangs by representatives of the State Board of Charities and Corrections of South Carolina revealed that at least fourteen other counties in addition to Oconee were using cages as quarters for convicts on their chain gangs. 4

The resources included in this nomination, the Oconee County Jail and the Oconee County Cage, are the only remaining properties associated with the early twentieth century Oconee County penal system.

Architecture: The Oconee County Jail is a locally important public building which incorporates several elements of neo-medieval design. The stepped and crenellated parapet, the asymmetrical plan with projecting polygonal bays, and the suggestion of a tower are direct architectural references to the popular conception of a medieval castle. It is likely that this architectural quotation was a deliberate attempt to relate the building's incarcerative function with the image of a medieval donjon, keep, and stronghold. The Oconee County Jail bears a striking resemblance to the Anderson County Jail, which was built ca. 1898 and designed by noted architect Frank P. Milburn. Milburn was known to re-use plans (the plans for the Forsyth County Courthouse in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, were re-used to build the Anderson County Courthouse in Anderson, South Carolina, ca. 1898)*, and it is possible that the Oconee County Jail was built from plans by Milburn.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Included in the nomination for the Properties Associated with the Oconee County Penal System are the Oconee County Jail, a two-story, brick building constructed between 1901 and 1906, and a jail on wheels, a metal cage on wheels which was used in the early twentieth century to quarter prisoners serving time on the chain gang. The properties are located within the city limits of Walhalla, the county seat of Oconee County, South Carolina. Together these two resources are historically significant as visual reminders of the main components of the early twentieth century penal system in Oconee County and the state, the jail and the chain gang. Oconee County is the only county known to retain both an early jail and a cage or car for chain gang members in a basically unaltered state. In addition, the Oconee County Jail is a locally significant architectural design.

Social History: The Oconee County Jail and the Oconee County Cage reveal information about the treatment of criminals in Oconee County and in the state in the early twentieth century. Since prisoners in county jails were generally persons awaiting trial who were presumably innocent under the law, the social ideal was to hold them for appearance at court, yet prevent them from suffering physically or morally. Life on the county chain gangs was harder. Since idleness was considered detrimental to the character of criminals and since crime was expensive and harmful to society, labor on chain gangs was intended to reform convicts while at the same time not prove physically injurious. The convicts wore leg chains and usually worked from sunrise to sunset. Living conditions were harsh. The cage was one facet of these harsh conditions.
